George, Abe, and the Time Portal

One summer day, George Washington was walking through the neighborhood in NY and stumbled upon a rectangular, black and purple hole. He wondered what it was. Was it a portal? Was it a transmitter? He was very curious so he walked through it. Suddenly, George was in a whole different version of where he was. It was a time portal! “Why does my town look so different?!” he said. Then he saw him... Abe Lincoln. Abe walked over to him and said “I know you, you’re George Washington!” he said. “Your story was what inspired me to be president” he said. “Why, without you, I never would of been president,” “I shall announce you’re here!” he said. George said “Ok”. Abe brought him to the middle of town and everyone recognized him and wanted to meet him. They both asked each other questions about each other and their time periods for about 2 hours. Then George said “I must go back to my time period and live the rest of my life”. They hugged and George went to the time portal and suddenly, he realized: The time portal had closed! “Oh no!” he said. “The time portal has closed!” Then George and Abe declared that George will be staying a bit longer and George and Abe ruled together for 19 days. During that time, every day twice a day, he checked the portal to see if it was open. Then, on the 20th day it had opened! George was so happy, but also sad. He knew that when he goes back he’ll miss Abe very much but he knew it was for the best. He told Abe that the portal had worked and he had to go back. Abe gathered everyone in town and told them that George was leaving. George said “I’ll miss you all and shall remember you all for as long as I live”. Then he went home, back to his time period and saw the portal close. It never opened again and Abe and George never saw each other again. Every time both of them saw the portal they both wished they could see each other again.
